FIFA is a football management sim. I hear you right, insert dirty f word here it's actually a football management sim. And all those fancy features? Those are not features that you will experience in FIFA. Those are improvements to your football club, and they are many. This game takes you into a world where you don't need to win by cheating, but actually succeed in a completely realistic way. FIFA is a game about the beautiful game, and also about its myriad forms of culture. Your club can enter and win the World Cup, or be a part of a national league. Build a team made of global superstars and legends of your country, or start from zero and build your club from the ground up. Then you can embark on an epic Champions League journey to conquer the continent, with matches often spanning two continents. In this world, you have international transfer windows; you can buy a player for €20 million, then sell them for €24 million. Why would you choose to spend your money that way? Because you can get that player for £20 million, because you are richer. And in this part of the game, the game will tell you what you have to spend. In an age of piracy and dodgy transfers, FIFA is here to give you the better, better deal. And of course, there are full opposition team data that makes matches and practice sessions more realistic. If you have previously used GameCopyCat to play FIFA 20, it is still fully compatible with FIFA 22, as do all the 3rd-party content (if you are wondering, you will be able to do the same with FIFA 21). This is the first game in the Ultimate Team series to have been EA Sports Football Club. What does that mean? It means this game is more than a football game. And so, EA Sports Football Club has been completely overhauled. The revamped mode, now called FIFA Ultimate Team, allows you to build a team of real footballers (or fake footballers, if you prefer) and earn cards in the process. The cards allow you to earn coins to spend on these footballers, which lets you improve your squad, as well as boost the reputation of your club, buy more contracts to extend the careers of your footballers, and unlock new items. In this last regard, at the start of a new season, new items will be unlocked for you, all of them
