The Court of Appeal on Thursday threw out an Oakland school district's resolution formally opposing state legislation aimed at protecting transgender students. The school district was found to have acted improperly by describing the measure as a threat to gender identity. The resolution was based on a ruling by a federal judge in a separate lawsuit that found transgender students are protected by the federal Equal Access Act. The district resolved the issue by agreeing to adhere to a legal opinion written by the ACLU and the ACLU of Northern California that concluded that transgender students' rights are protected under the federal law. Attorney Brian Raum said the school district's position was to take "an oath" that the resolution was an accurate statement of the law, which he said is a violation of the U.S. Constitution and California state law. The 2-1 ruling by a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was issued the same day a federal appeals court upheld a San Francisco school district's resolution opposing Proposition 8, the voter-approved 2008 initiative that denied the right of same-sex couples to marry. At issue is a 2012 lawsuit brought by 22 transgender students in Oakland to compel the district to change its discriminatory policy of prohibiting them from using bathrooms and locker rooms consistent with their gender identities. In the resolution approved by the Board of Education in July 2012, the district called the legislation an "unworkable, unnecessary and unconstitutional solution" and pledged to prohibit discrimination against transgender students and their families. Oakland Unified School District spokesman Troy Flint, said the resolution did not "in any way, shape or form advocate a constitutional amendment to the United States Constitution." He added that the board's position on the issue "is consistent with our nation's highest court." Nevertheless, he said, the district filed the resolution because it wanted to be "a good partner in addressing the needs of our transgender students."
