I am very new to RoR and I am trying to write a test using Capybara, where I have a field that takes a filepath value. I can't get the test to work correctly, because if I use just `find(:field, 'something').set(filepath)` Then I get this error when I run a test Failure/Error: Unable to find matching line from backtrace

ActiveRecord::RecordNotFound: Couldn't find StartingPoint with id=something So I tried to add the path, and that gave me this error

Failure/Error: Unable to find matching line from backtrace NoMethodError: undefined method `path' for # Anyone know what the difference is between these 2 methods and why I can't use the file path method? A: I do not see an issue in the given source. In this line:

`find(:field, 'something').set(filepath)` You pass a string to the find method (that's why it complains about an undefined method path - with a string it is looking for a path method), and the find method is trying to find a class attribute. In this line: find(:field,'something').set(path) You pass a path object to the find method, so it passes this method to the attribute, which is then bound to a file path (the path.to_s method calls the to_path method, which creates a path object). Welcome to
